VOLUME FIVE:

As my thoughts drifted without a clear transition, I found myself recalling an unexpected encounter with a former monk, a man stripped of his religious title yet rich in conviction.
He approached me with a gravity that suggested he bore a significant message, one he believed was divinely inspired.
With a voice tinged with urgency, he shared insights gleaned from what he claimed were extensive conversations with God.
His mission, he insisted, was to challenge the conventional wisdom surrounding prayer, particularly the notion that self-serving or frivolous requests would ever elicit a response from the divine.

Instead, he argued that true prayer must stem from a place of sincerity and selflessness, a perspective that resonated deeply within me, prompting a reflection on the nature of faith and the intentions behind our supplications.

While he presented a compelling case against the notion of transactional or bargaining prayers, my skepticism grew when he revealed that he had access to a direct line, likened to a 1-900 number.

This revelation took an unexpected turn when I learned that the number connected to a call center in India, which left me questioning the authenticity of his message.
The juxtaposition of his earnest delivery with the commercialized nature of the hotline created a dissonance that was hard to reconcile.
I found myself grappling with doubts about the sincerity of his sermon, as the idea of a direct connection to the divine seemed undermined by the reality of a corporate call center.

This experience highlighted the complexities of faith and communication, leaving me to ponder the true nature of spiritual connections in a world increasingly influenced by technology and commerce.
